The current study tested the hypothesis that population-level gender norms for eating and exercising more or less than peers and family background would moderate the relationship between early and later obesity. Thirty two-year-olds (M = 40.1 years, SD = 11.1 years) participated in two sequential interviews about their eating and exercising habits. These were conducted after participants had undergone standard anthropometric measurement to assess body mass index. Participants' reported their agreement with a number of questions about their diet, physical activity, and ideal body weight. The study was conducted in Australia, where the younger sample was predominantly female and the older, female-dominated. A path-analysis model using LISREL revealed that early family background, reported mothers' ideal body weight, and current diet influences on participants' weight were the strongest predictors of obesity in men and women, explaining 56% and 48% of the variance, respectively. Higher reported mother ideal body weight was a positive predictor of later obesity, and men whose mother did not disapprove of underweight women were more likely to be obese. This relationship was not observed in men whose mother disapproved of heavy or underweight women. The results of this study show an interplay between the socialization of children and young people from a young age, and family background, which predict adult obesity.#!/usr/bin/env bash # Copyright 2020 Google LLC # # Licensed under the Apache License, Version 2.0 (the "License"); # you may not use this file except in compliance with the License. # You may obtain a copy of the License at # # # # Unless required by applicable law or agreed
