Balancing patient demands with departmental efficiency: Predicting the attitudes of Medicare physicians for adjustments to their Medicare fee schedules. Physician fee schedules are driven by politics and economics. Congress determines the annual inflationary increases in Medicare physician fee schedules. However, in recent years Congress has been decreasing Medicare physicians' Medicare fees for costly services, thereby making more money available for other purposes. What will physicians do? This article uses structural equation modeling to predict physicians' willingness to change their fee schedules on the basis of their responses to nine financial instruments that mirror Congress's policy decisions. These instruments include the percent of total budget that would be lost as a result of changing a physician's Medicare fee schedule and the estimated cost of the change in a physician's fee schedule. Physicians' willingness to lose money to increase their Medicare fees is influenced by the relative priority of their major duties. Physician's willingness to lose money is influenced by their level of political influence, their estimation of the impact of a fee change on the demand for their services, and the extent of their income dependency. The estimated elasticity of physicians' fees for expensive services is .61. 1.
