What's new in Elden Ring:

[Game Title] Classic Fri, 21 Apr 2010 19:58:32 +0000Allgemeines PSP13496A recent report of pancreatic ductal adenocarcinoma (PDAC) mortality in young women in the United States shows alarmingly increasing trends in age. Further research is urgently needed to explain the change in incidence, to elucidate its causes, and to develop means to reduce both incidence and mortality. The tumor's genetic instability, frequent loss of the CDKN2A (p16) gene, and DNA damage would be expected to contribute to its high cancer risk, elevated risk of aggressiveness, and shortened survival in young patients. Autophagy activation and mitochondrial dysfunction have been proposed as potential drivers of a hyperproliferative response in PDAC arising in young women. However, to better understand PDAC pathobiology in young women, we propose microarray, proteomic, and metabolomic profiling of PDAC from women in the ages 20 to 49. We anticipate that these unbiased analyses will elucidate the biology of the young female PDAC and identify novel therapeutic targets for this high risk malignancy. We propose a cross sectional study of the p63-regulated secretome as a first step toward unraveling the transcriptional regulatory networks in PDAC driving a hyperproliferative state. Two major aims are proposed. The first is to perform microarray profiling and analyses of PDAC from young women to determine gene expression differences associated with age and gender. A second aim is to determine the biomarker potential of the transcriptional regulatory networks identified in the first aim to identify potential biomarkers and therapeutic targets.

We will use an unbiased gene-transcription network analysis as well as established technologies to determine whether both the secretome and transcriptome are altered, and whether there is new information provided by these two perspectives. The final aim is to use global network-based approaches and genome-scale metabolic modeling to define potential alterations in utilization of physiologic substrates (e.g. glucose and lipid) and therapeutic strategies (e.g. epigallocatechin-3-gallate) that could be aimed at lowering the risk of young women and their clinicians.
