It gives a reaction mechanism for the formation of indane from a reaction between a primary amine and nitrobenzene. I'm just wondering if this is possible. A primary amine simply forms an ammonium ion, but since the nitro group is more electron-deficient than the hydrogen, I thought an acid-catalyzed addition of the amine to the nitro group might be possible. But I can't find any evidence that this can happen. A: The reaction you are looking for is S_N2. The amine attacks the nitro group on the nitrobenzene. The resultant amine product then loses the proton from the primary site to form an N₂C₆ ring, with two vacant sites left for alkyl chain. What you've shown here is a debatably proton-dissociative amine-nitrobenzene S_N2 reaction, which happens in water, but can also occur in free-phase alcohols. A: Can an amine react with nitrobenzene? The answer is no. The reaction you're looking for is S_N2 substitution. Unfortunately your question has no reaction mechanism. So it's difficult to answer without context.
