Is it possible to reverse a certificate so that I know how that certificate was issued? I remember at one time receiving a certificate that I couldn't verify for some strange reason. So, I know the certificate was issued to the server by a public CA. But, can I reverse it to find out what that CA was? A: Some caveats: When you buy a SSL certificate from the trusted CA, they actually authenticate that the certificate is valid and bound to the claimed domain. (They may also include other information in the certificate that doesn't include the key that is used to verify it. This validation is not possible to reverse, it is just there to guarantee that you are talking to the correct web server.) There are ways to validate that a certificate is indeed signed by a trusted CA, and there are ways to verify that the CA cert is published by that CA, and there are ways to verify that the issued certificate is not spoofed.) These methods of the include an objective factor, such as that the CA uses MD5 as a signature scheme, and the specific certificate is signed by a trusted CA, and that is even an approximate trusted CA would be doing all of this for you already. Having said that, there are scenarios when this would be possible: say if you got a certificate with MD5, and the CA reported on the certificate that it was signed by "security CA" and had a "validity" period, it might be possible to validate that the certificate actually came from that CA, even if they were

One-day-old male broiler chicks were fed one of ten experimental diets formulated to contain 0, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, and 40 mg ascorbic acid (AA) per gram of diet. The basal diet containing 0 mg AA did not support full development. During the course of the experiment chicks fed the diets with higher concentrations of AA did not lose body weight and gained more weight than did chicks fed the 0 mg AA diet. The results of five successive necropsy examinations revealed that the diets containing 15 to 40 mg AA were nutritionally acceptable for broilers. Birds fed diets containing 25 to 40 mg AA per gram of diet had fewer feather follicles than birds fed the 0 mg AA diet. The quantity of AA in the diets appeared to influence plasma AA concentration.Q: How to access my AWS RDS via my Mac I am new to AWS. I want to spin up an EC2 instance and connect it to my RDS.
