It's a free magazine open-source, which means that anyone can download, modify and redistribute it for free. The problem is that I need to publish my own library (a set of functions) on this free magazine, but not in its core, in a specific page, which is provided by the magazine itself. Is there any solution? A: Most of the time this is done with a SubDirectory. You publish your library there and its freely usable. To make an example: Let's assume you have the directory: MSSQL Functions MyFunctions You would create a simple index.php file in this directory: As you can see, this file includes your library, which is stored in the "MyFunctions.php" file you have a direct link to it: class MyFunctions { public static function MyFunction() { // Code } } Note: if you want the directory to be searchable, you need to add it to your web server as "index.php" (normally it's "index.php?"). This would include your library and allows the user to use your functions. A: You can change it by creating a new shell using the command $ source ~/.bashrc If you would like to change it globally, update /etc/environment file, which is read by every shell (from the system or user account). However, I would suggest always setting up new user's.bashrc in the users home directory. For example, $ sudo cp /etc/environment ~/.bashrc $ chmod 644 ~/.bash
