Posted Tuesday, May 30, 2019 9:53 am WINTERGARDEN — A local development group plans to assemble thousands of water bottles for distribution to residents in the event of a statewide water shortage. Some 2,000 plastic water bottles have been collected over the past month and now groups are working to combine them into a collection of 60,000 that they hope to deliver to South Florida residents in the event of a water crisis. On Sunday, The Outdoor Edge, a nonprofit that organizes and promotes outdoor recreation, meets to create a list of members who want to volunteer to assemble the water bottles and distribute them to homes and businesses. Mike Vicic, president of the group and a Winter Garden resident, says the group's motto is to "help South Florida, not just a cause." But he did make a case for having a collection of water bottles distributed: "In the event of a water crisis, this will be a lifeline," he said. "If you have water, you have the ability to save water, and this is how we can save water." The project was born out of the coronavirus pandemic when the Outdoor Edge was looking for a way to promote social distancing, a critical measure during the pandemic as everyone from health care workers to tourists to beachgoers stay out of the public eye. Water bottles, collected from donations as well as purchases made on Amazon, are provided to the group. Its Facebook group, "South Florida Water Collection Drive," has grown to over 6,700 members. According to COVID-19 daily reports published by the Florida Department of Health, about 20,000 water samples have tested positive for the coronavirus. Vicic says the group is also collecting boxes, mugs, shoes, and bedding supplies, among other items, in order to accommodate people of all income levels and demographics. The group also can be contacted at 954-209-0417 or outdooredgeusa@gmail.com.
