Nice 2D graphics

How to Play:

Start the game from the Launcher

A 1st tile entry point

It's a maze with a trash pit in the center. You can add tiles to it. Usually you will have a slidedown cat on this maze.

There are 2 options

Trap the cat!

Let it out

You can switch between these options while in game. Usually you will start with 'let the cat out'. By pressing the escape button on your VR Controller you will be able to switch to trap the cat option.

To build a tile you have to drop an object onto it. As soon as you hit something, you lose a life. If you want to build it but it does not work you can drill a hole in your tile and try again. Sometimes you just can not build it. But that does not mean you need to waste a life. You can still toss items into the trash pit. So by releasing the objects from your VR Controller you can still gain a life.

The goal of this game is to sink as many animals as possible into the Trash Pit. For sinking your animals into the pit you have to hit a tile

GRAND THEFT AUTO GTA III: The Ballad of Gay Tony came out in August 2007, selling over 2.8 million units in its first week. The game received an overwhelmingly positive critical reception, and fans eagerly waited to see what would be the next installment in the game series. As the Grand Theft Auto III community grew, so did the hostility toward the series for being too violent. In 2009, the Rockstar team made the first real effort to become more inclusive of the LGBT community in the narrative and in-game portrayal of LGBT characters. Grand Theft Auto IV includes many more LGBT characters than its predecessors, and also features story content that includes homosexuality, same-sex romance, and gender-neutral clothing. GTA V features the return of the native American and Hispanic gang members, but it also features three playable sex variations: male, female, and androgynous. Like the previously released African-American character Lamar, the three gender variations are inspired by culture and their presentation as one. enagal". I must have been less than sixteen years old at the time. Websites normally redirect traffic to either an add page or a home page with links to press releases or a business directory. But my husband and I decided to run straight to the media, and to try to force other people to do the same. That afternoon, we contacted Radio New Zealand, the national broadcaster, the NZ Herald, the Southland Times, the John Kirk syndicated paper in Australia, the Radioellen newsletter by Danya International and The Amy Butcher's site from the United States. The local newspaper, the Southland Times ran the story the following day and the other media were quick to follow. They took some flack for it, but it was the only way to get the word out without web searches. The website was unplanned, one shot, and I quickly threw it up and hoped for the best. We then waited with excitement to see what the fallout would be. Another very capable and smart young woman joined me as co-author of the article. She published the second installment of the "Pitenagal" series on her website, called "Back From The Pit" at This website met with such great success that it moved to another continent. Fortunately, the core of the site remained my wife and I, along with the rest of my staff. When our Webmaster heard about the concept, we all let loose. The knowledge of the Internet was new to most of us and we spent many nights working through it. Before long, the number of submissions and posts to the site began to roll in. Klyde was quickly becoming one of the premiere sites in what was then called the Association of Geographic Information System (AGIS). Most of the posts on the site were unique, one of a kind stories. Our original focus was on advocating public, private, and social interest groups for the purpose of urging government departments to provide access to more information. We also focussed on advocating access to school zone maps. The Government Geospatial Information New Zealand (GGINZ) and the office of the Qualifications Authority refused to provide the data. Pitenagal's Ministry of Transport and Highways refused, also. Working with primary school districts and special interest groups (like the Boy Scouts), we ran the
