Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method for handling problems in the area of a security integrated into an electronic system. 2. Description of Related Art Modernly, security aspects are becoming ever more important in electronic systems. A correct change, in particular, in such systems can lead to a loss of important security data. Therefore, it is necessary to check a change and ensure that a critical security aspect of an electronic system is not affected in the course of handling the change. To this end, it is known to implement a code which is provided with a security module and to change the code by means of a transportable storage medium, in particular a so-called smart card or a memory chip. The change can then be checked. However, a change which is made in this way can affect not only a storage medium but also the electronic system. If a system error occurs during the change, the security key and the security module can be no longer checked, and the electronic system can be rendered unusable. It is known from WO 97/39060 to check a stored code such that the code is sent by a server via a data channel to a personal computer, where it is compared to a stored code. If there is a discrepancy, a warning is sent to the user. Onychomycosis and severe superficial candidiasis in an adult leprosy patient. A case of a 26-year-old male patient with a two year history of progressive onychomycosis and severe superficial candidiasis was reported. Clinical examination revealed multiple and painful onychomycosis, nails that were slowly advancing and which had developed dyschromia, extensive pain, tenderness and induration. After identifying a medical history of leprosy with lepra reaction and rheumatic manifestations, histopathology analysis was performed which confirmed onychomycosis and candidiasis.
