In the past few years, you've likely heard a lot of talk about the business benefits of a new breed of startups—deep-pocketed teams that promise ground-breaking innovation to big businesses, as well as to investors and other stakeholders in the wider technology ecosystem. Of course, this new mode of entrepreneurship has its own set of obstacles. Without large deep pockets, it's harder for new teams to attract talent. It can be more difficult to attract tech talent to a company that isn't yet established. Many are choosing to stay within the big tech companies. And potential early-stage investors are wary of investing in enterprises without a track record. With these challenges in mind, several organizations are working to change the game. And in the process, they're seeking to address these key questions: How can an early-stage company prove to a venture capitalist or an early-stage investor that it's more than an idea? How can an early-stage company promote its greatest asset: its team? How can an early-stage company attract more funding? How can an early-stage company keep the cash it raises? And, can an early-stage company find long-term success? These questions have two answers—and the most obvious one to us is that an early-stage company's success is determined by its ability to attract outstanding people and execute at a high level. Here's why we think so: Everyone wants to work for a winning company. For decades, American technology workers have witnessed firsthand the power of strong leadership. They've seen many tech companies fail. But those that succeed are those who have been able to attract
