Functional capacity is a significant prognostic outcome parameter after coronary artery bypass surgery (CABG). However, functional capacity is dynamic and subject to change. The purpose of this study was to elucidate whether statistical modeling of incremental exercise capacity (MICE) or peak oxygen uptake (VO<sub>2</sub>) can be used to predict functional outcomes after CABG. We studied 37 patients who underwent CABG in 2010 and 2011. All patients received the same grafting strategy: bilateral internal thoracic artery with radial artery graft and only single internal thoracic artery with distal to proximal sequential anastomosis. Lung, pleural, and mediastinal adhesions were assessed preoperatively via computerized tomography scan. A percutaneous cardiopulmonary support device was not applied in any of the patients. Functional capacity (VO<sub>2</sub>peak and MICE) was assessed with an incremental cardiopulmonary exercise test preoperatively and at 6 months after CABG. Moreover, the patients were asked to complete the 6-minute walk test and were asked to assess their quality of life at the same point. The mean age was 64.4 ± 9.7 years, and the mean postoperative period was 30.1 ± 11.8 months. The VO<sub>2</sub>peak significantly increased after CABG (p < 0.05).
