Frankly, I'd rather be turned into sausage just so I could stop that whole silly discussion about pilot training. The basic problem is that what we describe as accident prevention is really just marketing/advertising. Advertising techniques do not change the way we do stuff. So they only drive the cost down to the point where ordinary people can afford to buy into the advertising/marketing technique. That way, they make money for everybody. Whether you die because of it or not is up to you. Let's think about crash investigation for a minute. If we had a real measurable outcome of any kind, it would be a cost benefit analysis. But that would involve deaths. Now let's say that there was an accident that saved the lives of a few dozen people. Should we say that we pay two million to that pilot and his company so that we can have a higher chance of saving a few dozen lives. Think about that a minute. A pilot would have to carry all that equipment that the NTSB wants in order to inspect his aircraft. We pay them 2 million so that we can have a very specific type of accident that can save lives. Now why does that make sense? It is expensive, but it saves lives. It sure does save money, but that is not the point. It saves lives. What if the pilot's plane crashed and killed everyone on board? The NTSB would be very upset that this was not a high enough priority to put into their budget. The pilot would be put into jail for a very long time. Let's think about that. In fact, let's take the whole NTSB idea and run with it. What if everything said
