The quantification and characterization of PM10 (particulate matter less than 10 microm) in Beijing, China, in the time period from June to November in 2008 were carried out. The particles were characterized by electron microscopy, conductivity measurements, and X-ray photoelectron spectroscopy. The electronic mobility of PM10 and their role as metal aerosols in ambient aerosols were determined by the diffusion model and the single ion monitoring method, respectively. The detection of nanodiamonds in PM10 was discussed. The results show that the highest metal loadings in PM10 were aerosols with a size of 1-3 microm. The surface of the PM10 particles that moved in the atmosphere was changed by metal impurities. There were 25.3% of the aerosol particles as metal-rich and 4.9% of the particles were both metal- and nitride-rich. The diffusivity of 10-nm particles was larger than that of 1-microm particles. The concentration of PM10 was negatively correlated to the wind speed.
