Participants were instructed to choose as quickly as possible the shape that matched the sample image. The response keys were a narrow, gray rectangle on the right side of the screen; a wider, darker rectangle on the left side of the screen; and a thick, black line on the bottom of the screen.

The target stimulus was always presented in the center of the screen. The target stimulus was displayed for 1 s. Participants were then asked to indicate which of the three response options they had chosen by pressing the appropriate key on a standard keypad. Participants responded to a maximum of nine alternating target and non-target trials (a total of 54 trials). Before each new trial, the position of the target and the number of non-target trials were displayed. Participants performed six practice trials. Both hands were counterbalanced across participants. In the first test phase, the shape of the target was always the same, and the ratio of target trials to non-target trials was 50:50. The ratio of target trials to non-target trials was manipulated in the second test phase to balance the likelihood that a correct response to the target would be reinforced by the reward (i.e., to ensure that the test would be sensitive to individual differences in learning). There were four possible ratios of target trials to non-target trials, including three ratios of 50:50 and one of 10:90. Hence, there were four experimental conditions. The target consisted of a narrow gray rectangle, which was displayed either in the left or right half of the screen. The left half of the screen always contained three non-target stimuli, whereas the right half of the screen contained two target stimuli. All stimuli were presented against a gray background. There was a total of 12 practice trials and 192 test trials. Procedure {#s4c} ----- Participants were instructed to complete a set of tasks in one session. The tasks were administered in a fixed order, as follows: (1) demographic data; (2) intra-epidermal nerve fiber density e79caf774b

On the occasion of the University Games in Wrocław, the Polish government has officially recognized 29 June 2013 as the "Day of the Olympic Truce". Acting Minister of Sports Piotr Gliński announced the development at the 2011 Congress of the Polish Olympic Committee (PKOK) in Wrocław. He also presented PKOK's official calendar in which the upcoming Games in Wrocław, taking place in 2013, are not included. The calendar, published by the publication houses Polpress and Tabelog, reflects the fact that 28 June was already the official "Day of the Olympic Truce" from 1919 until today, when the International Olympic Committee formally recognised 29 June as the day on which the "official truce of World War I took place". Historical background of the establishment of 29 June as a day of peace According to a resolution passed on 29 June 1919, the international congress of athletes at the Paris Peace Conference concluded that the "truce of sports should be established on 28 June 1919 at a time which the International Olympic Committee has the right to be designated". On this day, 29 June, the International Olympic Committee was created in recognition of the essential role of sport for peace and the good of humanity. The day of truce was associated with the conclusion of the first Olympic Games, held in the city of Athens, Greece, in 1896. The second edition, held in Paris from 30 August to 17 September 1900, was the first to be halted by World War I. The final Olympic Games were held in Rome, Italy, from 29 August to 15 September 1924. Since then, 29 June has been associated with peace. The 29 June commemorations have been held annually in many countries and cities, including New York (USA), Sydney (Australia), and Paris (France). The official declaration of 28 June
