Gary Roberts War Slaves Part 2A Comparison of Methods for Determining Organ-Specific Excretion Ratios from Retrograde Colonic Effluent. An important element in the assessment of intestinal health is the potential of the colon to absorb and reabsorb nutrients. The ratio of reabsorption to absorption is known as the organ-specific excretion ratio (OSER) or reabsorption index (RI). The gold standard for the calculation of OSER is microdialysis, but technical and ethical restrictions may deter its use. In this study, we compared the use of hematocrit (Hct) and plasma-to-colonic effluent concentration ratios as alternative approaches to obtain OSER. We performed a prospective, intra-individual comparative study to determine the effect of three methods for calculating OSER on outcomes in the rat: 1) the hematocrit method, 2) the use of the plasma-colonic effluent concentration ratio (P/C ratio) and 3) the use of the plasma-to-colonic effluent concentration ratio (P/C ratio). Results showed a significant difference between the Hct and P/C ratios for the fecal parameters; however, no significant differences were found in the measured outcomes between the hematocrit and P/C ratios. These findings suggest that the P/C ratio is a valid alternative to the hematocrit method for measuring OSER and can be used as a less invasive
