What's new in World Enduro Rally:

: The Phantom Update by Derek Carty on February 27th, 2006
It's been a while since we checked in with our Out of the Park franchise, and as we write this we're making good use of the time given to us by MLB and other commitments, and we therefore look forward to wrapping things up properly when the time comes, instead of just leaving it to the last minute before our deadline. However, at the moment that matters - that is to say, right now - we have a bit of a problem. There's no clear leader in the standings going into this year's playoffs. Just a pack of six teams that can't decide who's going to be the odd one out. Who could go home without a win? Without at least a tie? That is the theme of the last few days, and our questions. First, where are we going? Since we've already gone out and compared them to last year's winner, the San Francisco Giants, and to see where the new uniforms are headed next, we're going to take a look at the six and see where each is going from here.

Chicago Cubs Where they're sitting: Fourth in the NL Central, and fourth-best in the NL Central with a record of 82-79. The future: Despite what people think, there won't be many changes to the roster this year. Aside from trading for Alfonso Soriano, they'll probably be the same team that finished third in the division last year. Add to that the fact that Cubs President Theo Epstein is apparently reluctant to give up on the season, and it's a given that they won't be among the pack of teams falling in the second round of the playoffs.

St. Louis Cardinals Where they're sitting: Twelfth in the NL West, second-best in the NL Central, third-best in the NL Wild Card race, fourth-best in the second round. The future: Despite losing three-fifths of their four candidates for the MVP, St. Louis is still just right behind the Cubs in the standings, only winning the Wild Card due to better record in the last half of the season. With Albert Pujols likely to win the Triple Crown for the second time in his career, and the team to go further in the playoffs than Intra and interscan variations of regional cerebral blood flow during the perception of spoken words in man. Spontaneous fluctuations of the regional cerebral blood flow (rCBF) were examined for 8 minutes using the ^{133}Xe clearance technique in 22 healthy volunteers in about 1.5 min intervals after the perception of spoken words. Analysis of variance revealed a significant effect of time and an interaction with the dependent variables speech perception capacity (lucency grade) and cortical functioning (phonetic discriminative capacity). The interindividual differences were checked against a control group. The effect of time in the experimental group was nearly the same on the right hemisphere as it was on the left hemisphere in spite of the fact that the subjects differed from each other in their speech perception capacity. The effect of time as well as the interaction with the dependent variables were confined to the frontal cortex. It was concluded that the present findings support the theory of a premotor role in speech perception.
