In the waning moments of the contest, punter Johnny Hekker had muffed a handoff. With a minute left, the ball came loose and the Bear took possession. The next play, with a Chicago receiver running directly in front of the Rams' sideline, quarterback Mitchell Trubisky threw a ball well short of the sticks. Instead of a touchdown, it appeared as if the Bears completed an interception. That, however, was not the case. Advantage, St. Louis. The Rams, with first-and-goal from the Chicago two-yard line, successfully got the ball to the end zone. "I was like, 'What the hell,'" Hekker said Monday. "It was the biggest miscommunication we had. We had no coverage to that side, it was wide open." St. Louis' Jacoby Glenn took the handoff from the center. He lost three yards but was able to jog a little bit before he was tackled by the Bears' five-defensive back stack. Unlike that play, the Rams' final touchdown came off a handoff. Multiple motor neuron disease: an overview. Multiple motor neuron disease is a rare neurological disorder in which the clinical features of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis are present in conjunction with those of either progressive muscular atrophy or progressive bulbar palsy. This article describes the clinical features, pathophysiology and management of multiple motor neuron disease. The identification of the genetic defect in familial cases may provide clues to the pathophysiology of the disorder. There is no evidence that the onset or severity of symptoms can be modified by
