I'm a senior student studying ECE, and am in the middle of an introduction to OS/2 as an operating system in Java. I have decided that I want to design an application that runs within OS/2 that is a GUI application, instead of running a shell script. My professor has given me this Java tutorial on how to build a swing application (I've been following that tutorial, and have gotten up to this stage: I am using Netbeans, and have created a simple interface within the default BasicAppGui theme. I would like to add a menu to the top right of my frame, similar to what I would get in any other graphical application. I have attached some pictures of what I would like to achieve, and I would like some help on how I can start this project. It seems that my professor would like me to take on a form of 3-tier architecture, using some class that I have not created yet, that I can use to build my application using, and manage data using. I have been struggling with this for about 2 weeks now, and really would appreciate some help. Thank you. A: You should create a JFrame and a JPanel. The JPanel should contain all controls of the GUI. You can add the JPanel to the 6d1f23a050
