The city is sometimes described as a distinct entity, but more often as a network of places, with the highway as the primary axis of transport (Brueckel & Ashworth, 2002: 125). The term "the city" describes both the physically built environment and the people inhabiting it, and the way that these two exist together. The development of the city can be interpreted as a network of spaces, places and relationships in which people make daily decisions (Guston, 2012: 3). To provide a more suitable hearing aid for individuals with hearing loss, researchers have sought to identify people's preferences for information and communication technology devices. This study builds upon the single route narrative theory of communicative competence. A preference for one device over another has been associated with the values, beliefs, prejudices, and attitudes that individuals hold. The researchers expect to be able to move beyond the path-dependency that limits testing of effectiveness and user acceptability. The researchers will investigate the applicability of a preference-based evaluation approach to the design of e-audiometry. Specifically, the researchers are interested in knowing whether: (1) there is consensus among people with hearing loss for which devices are appropriate for them; (2) there are differences in the choice of devices between groups; and (3) there are differences in the choice of devices according to age and gender. According to the participants, the ideal national centre is one in which people live comfortably and healthily. Da Nang, Vietnam was selected as the most appropriate location for the establishment of a medical centre in Vietnam in the next five years. Seven major factors influence the decision to build a national centre: cost effectiveness, health service, location, accessibility to the community, the state of healthcare in Vietnam, the demographic structure of Vietnam, and national security. The factors ranked as important in the decision to build a medical centre in Vietnam were location, accessibility to the community, the state of healthcare in Vietnam, and cost effectiveness. Da Nang, with its convenient geographical location, is able to serve as a medical centre for the entire country.
