players can utilize the nitro system to give their vehicle an advantage in all types of racing except for the first and the second-half of the career. the goal is to be the best player and beat the computer on each course. even if it's the first time you're playing one of need for speed: hot pursuit, you won't have any trouble knowing the basics of the game, which is easy enough to grasp thanks to its accessibility and very basic gameplay. however, you should still understand some of the car customization, driving techniques and how to navigate the maps. the controls of hot pursuit are very simple and don't require any extra guidance while playing. when you start a race, first of all, you can choose the racing car, the weather condition, and the control settings as well as a number of camera options, mission objectives, and so on. the graphics of hot pursuit are just as satisfying as any other need for speed games. you don't even feel like you're playing it on a ps3. maybe it's because of the smaller than usual screen size. anyway, you will notice that hot pursuit brings you a lot of full hd details, from the car models to the environment to the pedestrians. playing hot pursuit will look as good as playing other need for speed games. it's like playing a ps2 game. you can also create your own tracks using the track creator, which is the game's best feature, and players don't need any guidance to create great tracks. the game has five racing types to choose from, but none of them is really worth it. by far, the one that is most satisfying is the first mission of hot pursuit, which is called the police pursuit mission. the idea behind this is to drive a car out of a block and through several checkpoints without being caught. each checkpoint is marked by a red police patrol car. but there is a catch: if you run out of time, your car will be set on fire. this mode is so much fun, as you cannot just use your on-board powerful gas-guzzling engine to outrace the roadblocks, but you have to utilize high-performance tricks such as sharp turns, special maneuvers, and even utilize the nitro-system to gain an advantage.
