as one might expect, a videogame simulation of a workplace, a building and a factory (that's what the developer has called it) is of interest to anyone who cares about videogames, so it's curious that the only people who seem interested are pretty much working for the game developer. such an interest would seem to come out of the same marketing campaign that delivered us the first chapter of bioshock infinite, and indeed, there is a strong tie between the two. while we're sure that there's much good work to be done on a new game, we think the interesting work is that of creating a game that's going to be something new under the sun, no less so than bioshock infinite. and in this case, when we do get "new," it isn't a new take on the territory of game design; it's a new take on the territory of virtual reality. if you go to the playlist for this video you'll get a taste of what we mean. the videos discuss the potential that vr holds to open up your senses to the world around you, both physical and virtual. they do this by using the senses of touch, feeling, hearing, and of course sight, to recreate the world we all live in. we discuss how that will be achieved and what the possibilities are for a videogame that plays on the principle of "you have to be there," but we're also interested in what the implications are for the game itself; what is the game itself, what function does it perform, what is its relationship to vr, and what might the presence of this new form of immersion add to a videogame. there's no question that vr is about to produce a radical new way to experience videogames. it is, in fact, likely that the difference between 3d games and vr games is going to be mostly in the space where your head is. vr will reduce a videogame's perspective to that of the first-person character's perspective.
