
Bubble Bobble

the game boy version of bubble bobble lacks the ability to grab enemies in mid-air, but it does have a few other features that the nes version does not. first of all, the game has the ability to pause at any time. this has its uses, such as in the case of the final boss battle, but also has a few drawbacks. after the game has been paused, any defeated enemies will stay defeated for an additional three seconds. this can lead to players being able to clear a large amount of levels if they decide to pause on their first playthrough. the nes version of bubble bobble came with a soundtrack in cartridge form that was similar to that of the arcade version. since cartridges were not particularly large, there was a 3:1 compression ratio, meaning that the soundtrack was much smaller than the actual game. this was a common way of distributing soundtracks in the late 1980s and early 1990s as cartridge games were still the norm for video games. though not officially the final version of bubble bobble, the nes version of the game is considered one of the best-looking and best-sounding versions. the nes version features superior graphics to that of the arcade, and also features more sound effects. even the game manual comes with a cover that features the game logo, which is the only time that the title of the game was ever printed on a cover. perhaps the biggest difference between the nes and arcade versions of the game is that the nes version has a cover screen that holds all of the graphics on screen and allows for more features. every level in the game is divided into 10 areas, and the game begins to move around once players have captured all the monsters. this was done to make the nes version feel like a whole game in a way that the arcade version did not.

unlike the nes version, the game boy version of bubble bobble was a straight port of the arcade game, with no additional features. the original arcade version had two buttons and was more of a side-scrolling beat-em-up, but the game boy game lacks the right-to-left scrolling and is more of a top-down action game. this means that there are no areas in the game, just a linear path that must be completed in order to reach the end. this has the effect of somewhat simplifying the game and gives the game boy version a different feel than the nes version. another change made to the game was that the game boy version was released two years after the nes version, which meant that it had more recent versions of the game to use as reference. the game boy version was also released in europe with the same names and artwork as the north american version, but with the addition of a tag saying that it was for japan. this was done to ensure that retailers wouldnt sell the european version of the game for the north american version, which would have been a mistake at the time. the master system version of bubble bobble is the most faithful to the arcade game, with even the graphics and sound being almost identical. the differences between the master system version and the arcade game are mostly in the soundtrack, where the master system version has an entirely new arrangement of the game soundtrack. this version of the game also comes with a game gear version as well, which is notable as this is the first time that the game gear was used as a primary platform for a taito game. the game gear version is similar to the master system version in that it features a new arrangement of the soundtrack, and it also features some graphics that differ slightly from the arcade version, but are nonetheless close to the master system version. 5ec8ef588b
