The Format code you have entered is incorrect, it should be 0 because that's the internal number format code for R (Indian Rupee). It would still be ok to change the value to 1 in your formula, but it would be more suited as a text value for end users. Do you have the option to change the formatting of the column when you format the table? @kitdoug Hi paddy, As you know, the numerals should be in blocks of 10 digits for a well formatted number. If you use a digit for the 2nd, 4th, 6th and 8th then the formatter will see the number has been entered incorrectly and will put the currency symbol after the hundreds (or thousands if you use the thousandths marker). If you do use the thousandths marker to indicate the thousands then the integer part of the number will have been formatted as currency. If you use it without marking the thousandths the converter will assume that you have the thousands marker and that the millions is optional. You would first have to decide what you want Excel to do if you use custom formatting, for example if you wanted it to format the date as a text format but want numbers to be numeric then you would have to use the text-0 format. A number of entries in the comments discuss dates with varying formats. What is the column formatted as? If your column is a date, you must enter the date as a date. Enter a comma to indicate the decimal point. If it is a number, enter the number. I have noticed this behaviour before. If you change the formatting to a different currency or date format, the underlying number remains the same. However, my spreadsheet has some calculations happening in the same Excel sheet that show the original value in the cell, as well as in a number of adjacent cells.
