to help her create the all-important impression of legitimacy, akhtar contacted veterans of london's crime scene - including leslie ash - to inform them about a pakistani crook called "krishna kumar" who "ran a protection racket for burglars", offering them the opportunity to "clean up". these men were then recruited to appear in the movie as krishna's "customers" - complete with concealed guns - to give the impression that their savings were being stolen in return for a percentage of the money stolen from the gang. the characters in the movie are completely fictional and akhtar acknowledges her own creator's bias. the story's protagonist has had its share of detractors online but akhtar holds no grudges against them. "i understand they have reservations with the romantic angle. i get that and i fully respect that and i wouldn't want to burden it on other people, to make it seem they've understood the film on their own. they can make their own personal assessment and decisions," she tells 60 minutes. there are plenty of visual effects, colourfully-lit sections of the movie with some strong expressions and dialogue that has passed the censors with ease. the villains are brilliantly portrayed and the actor playing the gangster who eventually gives krishna kumar the boot comes across like marlon brando. the standout moments belong to the heroine - kangana ranaut - who gets to deliver a killer monologue when krishna kumar realizes he cannot reach his "customers" and see if he has any remorse or regrets. in a word: it is electrifying. 5ec8ef588b
