This wouldn't be possible with CSS only magic, which means it's using Web Font Loader -- one of many CSS technologies that are driven by JavaScript. This allows your site to load web fonts asynchronously on demand without first loading all of your fonts, and just as importantly, it allows your site to use Google Fonts without having to splurge for the free tier. This is a perfect example of yet another feature in the recent Evolution release of Adobe's technology's web portfolio. It's simple enough when your site is already using a variant of web fonts, but what if your site is a mashup, such as a news site that stuffs in popular fonts as your layout needs require? Very early on we'll be looking at ways to make this really simple to implement in NextDRAW. If your site isn't already using this capability, you can get started quickly by visiting: webfontloader.net as you would any other embedding platform.

Learn more about webfonts and the Fonts API . Adobe creates tools and technologies that are intuitive and easy to use, and present great visual experiences to the end user. In Visual Studio, we are happy that these new tools are built on our high-level user experience framework, and we are confident that we will be able to deploy these features and maintain them better and faster than what you experience with the Adobe Creative Cloud, regardless of the platform you are using.
