The malicious code, which exploits a vulnerability in Internet Explorer 8 (IE 8) to steal user log-in credentials and other information, was first discovered on Friday. An undisclosed "high volume cyber security company" issued a warning about the incident on Tuesday. "We have recently identified new variants of a type of exploit known as Remote Code Execution (RCE) vulnerabilities that may be used to compromise systems," the company said in a statement. "These vulnerabilities have been found in a number of online services, including but not limited to some popular online communities and forums. Some of these services have been hosted by servers in Iran. Based on recent communications with the vendor of these services, we believe the majority of the servers on which this exploit has been found were compromised in early August." Google has contacted the company to offer its help with fixing the security flaws. The affected sites include social networking communities and online discussion forums and email discussion boards, the company said. Google says that it is not yet aware of any "significant misuse" of the security hole. However, the situation is eerily similar to the Stuxnet worm, which was first identified in 2010 and is believed to have been created by a US-Israeli collaboration to try and slow Iran's nuclear program. The nation's nuclear enrichment program was put under severe strain, but the tactic was eventually discovered by the country's enemies and the code used in the attack has since been leaked to various tech companies. For now, Google is advising users not to open any suspicious email messages. Users can verify if they are being attacked by visiting Google's Webmaster Tools
