An animal model for human blood doping. The aim of this study was to develop an animal model for human blood doping to investigate its effects on muscle energy metabolism. In a proof-of-principle experiment, nine ponies (Equus caballus) were subjected to the blood doping regimen consisting of the intravenous infusion of 40 ml/kg of glucose dissolved in 10 liters of saline (i.e., a rate of infusion of 10 mmol/kg of plasma) for 6 h. In six control animals, the infusions were replaced by an equal volume of saline. A standard euglycemic-hyperinsulinemic clamp technique was employed to measure the effect of blood doping on muscle metabolism. Plasma glucose and insulin concentrations were kept at 6 mmol/l and 5 mU/l, respectively, throughout the clamp study. The ponies that had received the blood doping regimen showed a significant increase in their glucose uptake (median, (interquartile range)), by (median) 0.69 (-0.09, 2.23) micromol/kg of muscle.g, compared to the controls (-0.08 (-0.08, 0.41) micromol.kg-1.min-1, P = 0
